Boat Building Day:

We had a brilliant science day on Tuesday, continuing our work about Polar Regions. E-safety:

After the latest fun and games of the so-called challenge that will remain nameless, it's well known that myths, hoaxes and urban legends are quite often seen and spread on YouTube, invariably by big influencers who add to the spread of disinformation. Interestingly, YouTube have announced they are adding a 'fact check' to search results on what they call sensitive topics. The feature is being released in India first and will be in other countries soon. It remains to be seen how far the feature will go and how effective this will be but it sounds as though it's a step in the right direction.

Phishing and the secure padlock...

Good advice to children and young people is to always check the web address bar to see if it has the little padlock on the left hand side and the web address starts with 'https', with the s denoting secure. Security researchers are finding that criminals are also using the padlock in the hope that you'll be tricked into thinking the site is legitimate and/or safe.

It's still good advice to check for a secure connection, but users should also check:

- Grammar and spelling (this is the easiest and the most common that we find).
- Suspicious popups making outlandish claims (e.g. win an iPad).

- A slight alteration to the web address (an obvious one might be Barc1ays, where the L has been changed to a figure 1).
